

and colour to the book. He had the masculine vigour of intellect to embody his vision of mathematical automation; she had the social position and intellectual grace which complemented his talents and tended to restore what he had lost in the deaths of wife and daughter.

Farr's English Life Table No. 3 owed much to Charles Babbage. It was constructed and printed by a machine which was a replica of one designed and made by Scheutz, father and son, according to Babbage's ideas, though operating on somewhat different principles. This machine was exhibited at the General Register Office during the 1862 exhibition, but where it now is no one knows.

Babbage sought public recognition. The Government had contributed towards the expense of constructing the difference engine. Babbage wanted a grant, not so much for the money itself as for the seal it would put on the worth of his idea. His deliberate seeking of such a reward is distasteful, yet in character with the man. As Lady Lovelace told him 'yours is to love truth . . . but to love fame and glory, honours yet more'. If only he could have seen himself as she saw him. The labour itself was the reward and is his enduring honour.

Microanalysis of Socio-economic Systems: A Simulation Study. By GUY H. ORCUTT, MARTIN GREENBERGER, JOHN KORBEL and ALICE M. RIVLIN

[Pp. xviii + 425. London: Harper & Row, Publishers, 1961. $8]

IT is unusual to find a book of this length devoted to proposals for a research programme, only a small part of which has actually been carried out. This volume, the first of a series relating to the work of the Social Systems Research Institute at the University of Wisconsin, sets out proposals for a statistical analysis of the consumer section of the United States economy by the 'simulation' technique. The authors' objective is to develop a method which will enable them to predict the future numbers and types of consumers, and their savings, expenditure, etc., and their reaction to events such as a change in interest rates. Thus their programme involves both demography and economics, although the work carried out is limited to the demographic side. It is their intention to group consumers into households which would be treated as being, for economic purposes, the decision-making units, so a method of projecting the population in household or family groups is required. Exponents of the 'pocket model office' technique will find the simulation method used familiar. The model used to represent the United States population consists of a sample of about 5,000 adults, grouped into households comprising either a married couple (with their children) or a single adult.

An I.B.M. 704 computer was available for the work and the main interest of the book to actuaries lies in the detailed account which is given of the method of projection and of the computer routines which were developed to carry it out. The procedure was, basically, to project the population a month at a time, applying mortality, marriage and fertility rates to each appropriate individual in the sample; since the rates were applied to individuals it was necessary to draw random numbers with the requisite probability to determine whether each individual would live, die, marry, etc. In the case of marriage, a partner was selected from the sample population. No special attempt was made to obtain male and female marriage rates which would be consistent in a changing population; in effect both sets of rates were used and the results averaged. The fertility rates used were specific for parity only, but a further factor was used which varied according to the duration since the previous birth, or since marriage in the case of the first child. The fact that the women exposed to risk of fertility are grouped with their households
