Access Database Window and Overview

Database Window

The Access Database Window allows quick access to all the elements of the database. These elements include: a) tables of data, b) queries that generate new tables, c) forms for data entry, d) reports for database printing, e) macros for automating tasks, and f) modules of Access Basic code.

Object View Modes

Each major category of Access object (e.g., table, query, form) can be viewed in at least two modes. In normal mode (Open), the object displays actual data from the tables. In design mode, the internal structure of the object (e.g., table definitions, query contents, form design, report layout) can be edited.

Datasheet View

The easiest way to view actual data is in a datasheet window—the default display when a table is opened. Drag the splitter bars to change field display widths and height. A single click on a column, followed by a second click and drag, is used to reorder the columns. Data itself is not affected.

Database Table: Clicking a tab selects the type of object to be created (New), to be run (Open) or to be edited (Design).

Right click the mouse on any Access object in the database window to see a list of toolbars associated with currently selected object. Choose "Customize" to change the buttons on a toolbar.

Right click the mouse on any Access object in the database window and a properties menu will appear. Actual menu contents depend on the type of object.

Right click the mouse in the unused area of the database window (any tab selected) for a menu allowing window appearance to be changed (e.g., View, Arrange Icons, Line Up Icons). Tables to be added (e.g., Import, Link Tables) and relationships between tables to be edited (Relationships, see page 2 of chart for more details).

Type a row number in the window to go to a specific row. The Find option in the Edit menu can be used to look for rows by value. More sophisticated searches can be done using the Record menu.

Context Sensitive Toolbars

All Access toolbars are context sensitive, meaning they change based on the type of database object that is selected. Toolbars are moved by clicking and dragging on an area without a button. If the toolbar is not positioned over the top or bottom of the window, it becomes a tool box.

Navigation Buttons

The navigation features at the bottom of the table view window make it easy to reposition the view within the table. Similar buttons can be added to the various toolbars by choosing Customize from the toolbar properties menu, then choosing Record buttons. Buttons can also be added to forms.

Databases vs. Files

A common misconception is to think of databases as collections of files. Access, however, stores nearly all of its data and related objects in just a few files, mainly the MDB file. Only one database may be opened in Access at a time, although data from other databases may be referenced or imported.

What's New in 97?

Access 97 offers a number of enhancements to earlier versions (e.g., Access 2 and Access 7). Some of the most significant of these enhancements include:

Internet Support: Many Access objects can now be published directly to the Internet. Reports and tables, for example, can be saved as HTML files, making them easily accessible to anyone having a web browser. The new Hyperlink data type also allows direct hypertext links to other documents to be embedded in data. Forms and reports, Mailings lists can also be exchanged with Outlook, the new Office 97 application that supports e-mail, scheduling and group work.

Form Capabilities: Access forms can now be created using the familiar tab control that is widely used in Windows applications. Using the control, different portions of a form can be made visible depending upon which tab is pressed.

Interface Customization: The ability to customize the Access interface has been expanded. Users can now create both toolbars and associated menus, as well as customizing existing ones.

Office Assistant: Like all the Office 97 applications, the Office Assistant feature is discussed while Access is in use. Left click the button for a list of topics relating to the current activity. Right click to hide the button or change its appearance.

Access Objects

An Access database consists of six fundamental types of objects:

-  Tables: Data that is conceptually stored in rows and columns on disk. A database may contain many such tables. If that database also contains features for integrity checking and establishing relationships between tables, it is a relational database.
-  Queries: Procedures intended to extract data, in tabular form, from other tables. Access queries possess many of the characteristics of SQL. Filters and, once created, can be used in most places where tables are used (e.g., reports, forms).
-  Forms: User-designed screen formats used to customize the user interface for a given Access database.
-  Reports: User-designed output formats normally intended to go to a printer or a printer-like device (e.g., a FAX modem).
-  Macros: Saved collections of Access commands that perform actions normally performed using the mouse or keyboard.
-  Modules: Collections of Access Basic code (nearly identical to MS Visual Basic) that can be called by other database objects (e.g., forms).

Levels of Programming

Non-programming: Using the Wizards and the Access interface, along with predefined formats such as Accessories it is possible to accomplish many tasks. Users may need to change object properties (which appear in property sheets accessed with a right mouse click on an object) to achieve additional customization. Knowledge of some Access Basic functions, such as converting a number to a string, may also be useful. The names of these functions are generally displayed by field wizards, and can be examined using Help.

Macro-programming: Macros are like programs, except their "language" consists mainly of commands that can be issued by the user through the interface. Thus, non-programmers who know the Access interface can learn to use macros readily enough. Macros are attached to objects, such as buttons, and may also be associated with Event properties, meaning they invoke when a specified event happens (such as a window opening).

Basic Programming: Programming in Access Basic requires significant study, but expands the range of possible customizations. Code is attached to object events (Event Procedures) or may be stand-alone code (Modules) accessible to all objects. Eventually, there is talk of merging Access and Visual Basic.
