Building Parent Engagement in Schools Larry Ferlazzo, Lorie Hammond, 2009-09-23 This work is a report on the positive impact of parental involvement on their child's academics and on the school at large. Building Parent Engagement in Schools is an introduction to educators, particularly in lower income and urban schools, who want to promote increased parental engagement in both the classroom and at home, an effort required by provisions of the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001. It is both an authoritative review of research that confirms the positive impact of parental involvement on student achievement and a guide for implementing proven strategies for increasing that involvement. With Building Parent Engagement in Schools, educators can start to develop a hybrid culture between home and school so that school can serve as a cultural bridge for the students. Filled with the voices of real educators, students, and parents, the book documents a number of parent-involved efforts to improve low income communities, gain greater resources for schools, and improve academic achievement. Coverage includes details of real initiatives in action, including programs for home visits, innovative uses of technology, joint enterprises like school community gardens, and community organization efforts.

Parental Involvement Joanne Scarcella Clemente, 2002 Research has shown that increased parental involvement enhances student achievement Throughout the educational system efforts have been made to involve parents in various activities to keep parents informed of student progress and to enlist parents as partners in the education of their children Although knowledge has certainly informed the practice many children are not receiving the support they need to succeed and many parents and teachers still do not know what to do. Some parents want to be involved but do not have the time to be actively involved while still others have neither the skills nor the language. Further, teachers need support in their efforts to involve parents. Relatively little has been done through the use of technology, particularly telecommunications. This case study research documents the implementation of a technologically innovative web-based school program, Homeworks.net, to keep parents in an urban middle-class community informed of student activities, projects, progress, and problems. Six teachers and 28 parents, approximately 20% of fourth and fifth graders in a NYC public school, participated in the study. After installation and training, a series of interviews were conducted with parents, teachers, the principal, and the software representative. These and the documented communications, email, and web-based calendar between home and school were subsequently analyzed to develop a holistic picture of parent-teacher communications. The findings showed that although parents and teachers believe that person-to-person and telephone communications were better, they rated email correspondence more favorably than notes sent home through students. Parents expressed the need for better and speedier information that could be delivered by a robust web-based class calendar which provides information about class work, homework, projects, and events. The data collected demonstrates the diversity of parental viewpoints and suggests that many forms of intervention are needed to encourage parent involvement in schools. Faulty technology and internet connectivity impeded the study and point to the need for a well-planned technologically supported infrastructure. Teachers also need professional development to support the use of newer technologies. Recommendations for further research and future web-based implementations are discussed.

Doing Good Parenthood Anna Sparrman, Allan

Westerling, Judith Lind, Karen Ida Dannesboe, 2017-01-24. This edited collection shows that good parenthood is neither fixed nor stable. The contributors show how parenthood is equally done by men, women, and children in and through practices involving different normative guidelines. The book explores how normative layers of parenthood are constituted by notions such as good childhood, family ideals, national public health, and educational strategies. The authors illustrate how different versions of parenthood coexist and how complex sets of actions are demanded to fulfil today's expectations of parenthood in Western societies. This interdisciplinary book will be of interest to research scholars in child and family studies, students, experts, social workers, politicians, teachers, and parents.
