

Tips for Parenting Teens

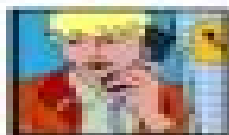

Parenting teens has always been an art and a science, with a bit of luck thrown in. Although frustrating and stressful for many, parenting teens can still be fun, exciting, and fulfilling. Here are a few tips to consider. None are designed to "control" the adolescent and guarantee stress-free parenting, but they can give you a head start at influencing a healthy, happy, and safe adolescent journey to adulthood.

1 IDENTITY. Teenagers seek to discover a positive identity that expresses their individuality. Peers, music and rock stars, and other persons they view, influence their decisions. Changes in personal appearance are testaments of normal experimentation in identity by teens. Monitoring their sense of self-worth may be required, but ignore considerations in favor of topics such as their effectiveness, safety, and well-being.

6 FREEDOM AND LIMITS. Teen feeling your teenager (an adult) but also not always respected about behavior, they will need to set limits and establish boundaries. Look for the absence of what you can accept and what the teen wants. Monitor, and let the teen know you are aware of activities. Be reasonable, practice letting go, and decide when are safe rules that promote independence.

2 PARENT COMMUNICATION. Seeing changes in your communication style or speaking habits. Frequently, teens' tough, but will maintain your teenager's ability to listen, not effective and only in day negative status. Preserving, sometimes, correcting behavior, status, judgment, yelling and screaming. Comparing the teen's behavior with more successful peers, and not being able to control when you are wrong or when you are right.

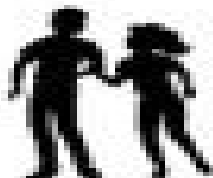

7 EMOTIONS. Emotions up and down make teen years difficult. Teens may struggle with controlling their emotions and be unable to understand how they feel. Emotions, the ability to understand how your teen feels, listening, and offering support and reassurance. Avoid statements that lead to feelings of being out of control, such as "I'm not sure how you feel." Learning about symptoms of depression can help you determine whether your teen suffers from this illness.

3 PEERS. Feeling accepted and part of a peer group are crucial to teens. They feel alienated when they are different from their peers. But all peer groups are not equal. Some may experience with anti-social behavior, alcohol and drug use, or peers to determine membership secrets. Talk about peer pressure early to help teens evaluate peer groups later and make choices that match their values.

8 HEALTH & FITNESS. Regular exercise, eating breakfast and drinking to lose weight are not uncommon with teens. Eating disorders often start in early teens, and girls are at the most risk. Awareness about substance abuse and eating disorders can alert you to signs and symptoms. Not only with professional guidance if you suspect problems. Lack of rest is also a hazard of teenage living and contributes to moodiness and irritability. Help make sure your teen gets a well-balanced diet and gets adequate rest.

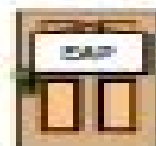

4 SEX. It is common for teens to begin showing interest in the opposite sex. There may be sexual experimentation, but studies show that most teenagers do not have sexual intercourse before graduating from high school. Sex, sex education, and giving the right information to teens is important. Starting early to communicate your values and concerns about sex and sexual activities in an open and honest way to help them keep their hopes for the best.

9 THINKING ABOUT LIFE. Teens experiment with ways of looking at the world. They apply scientific thinking to values, morals, issues of authority, empathy, relationships, and justice. They try new values and have about thinking in questioning. Some teens may cause stress for parents. Support your teenager's position about social, political, moral, and spiritual issues, but maintain your established traditions of family, cultural, or religious values. Support the positive aspects of intellectual growth.

5 SELF-ESTEEM. Teens struggle with their self-esteem. Overvaluation of appearance, thin, hormonal-driven changes, and the body's refusal to do the right thing at the right time can make for a difficult period. Help your teen feel valued by giving reassurance that they are loved no matter how they look. When important, avoid negative comments that can only make it a bigger battle of self.

10 WHAT THE CAP CAN DO. Every parent's experience parenting a teenager is different. Allow parents to provide their support from side for it. If you have concerns about your teenager's behavior, the CAP can help. Resources for specific issues you face and general information on parenting are available. The CAP can help you find the answers you seek.
