

Writing essays in exams

Secrets of exam success

A good essay

A good essay is easy to read when the ideas are clearly expressed and logically organised. The writer also demonstrates familiarity with important issues and concepts relevant to the topic.

Most importantly, a good essay offers the reader a succinct response to the essay question in the form of a reasoned and well-organised argument.

It is not easy to write a good essay and even more difficult to write a good essay under exam conditions. Preparation and rehearsal are vital. Students sometimes feel that it is not possible to plan for essay writing in exams because they won't know what the topic will be until they see the exam. This is a mistake. You can and should plan for what you will do in the exam by practising writing essays for exams as early as possible.

This pamphlet will help ensure that you are well prepared for exam essay writing.

What do examiners look for?

Essays are a common form of assessment at university level because they can be used to assess a range of skills as well as subject knowledge. Writing essays under exam conditions is quite different to 'normal' essay writing, however. Generally, you will not have access to source material or notes; you have only limited time to reflect on the question and plan your response; there is no time for re-drafting or major editing.

Fortunately, examiners take these factors into account. They will not expect a perfectly crafted piece of writing; they will not expect extensive referencing; they will not expect arguments to be as well-structured and supported as in an assignment-style essay.

Some departments will give you explicit guidelines about what they are looking for in exam essays. If such information is not available, however, assume that examiners are looking for and evaluating the following:

Has the question been answered? Marks will be allocated for certain pieces of information you have included and for the depth of your discussion. No marks can be awarded if you don't answer the question, no matter how interesting your response.

Knowledge of the subject area: Demonstration of understanding of the concepts, theories and issues explored through the course.

Critical thinking skills: Have you made connections and comparisons between different arguments, interpretations or fields? Have you evaluated the merit or strength of particular theories or pieces of evidence?

Ability to produce a reasoned and organised written argument: The 'argument' is the thread holding an essay together. An essay should adopt and argue for a particular position in relation to an issue, a question or a contention. Examiners will be evaluating the clarity, comprehensiveness and structure of your argument.

Reading and reflection: Have you systematically reviewed the materials used in the course or have you occasionally skimmed the essential reading for tutorials? When reading, have you compared authors, studies and results and identified connections, relations and counter-arguments? All these things will be apparent in your essay.

Written communication skills: Grammar, sentence construction, expression, punctuation and spelling – even handwriting – all contribute to the clarity of your essay. Whether or not examiners are looking at written expression specifically, it will influence your final result.

Where can you improve?

Reflect on your strengths and weaknesses. Use the criteria above to identify which areas of essay writing you need to improve most. Do you know enough about the subject? Have you read and analysed the essential material? Do you need to work on your written English or your construction of written arguments?

Prepare yourself

Find out what you will be expected to do in the exam:

- How many essays must you write in the exam?
- How many marks will each one be worth?
- Will you have some topic choice or have to write on any and all topics covered by the course?

Note how much time you will have to write. The time available to write on a topic – along with the number of marks allocated – indicates the breadth and/or depth with which you are expected to cover the topic.
