The 1994 National Commission on Indian Education found that Indian students had the lowest graduation rates and the highest dropout rates of any ethnic group in the country. The commission also found that Indian students had the lowest scores on standardized tests and the highest rates of suspension and expulsion. The commission recommended that Indian students be given special services, including individualized instruction, cultural education, and career counseling. It also recommended that Indian students be given the right to opt out of standardized tests and to be exempted from certain school rules. The commission's findings were a wake-up call for the federal government and state education agencies to take action to improve the educational experience of Indian students.
