It was among the Bloomsbury set in England that design and theoretical modes came into full flower. As the heirs to the traditions of Wilde and the Arts and Crafts movement, the designers of that set created interiors that were stage sets for modern living. Roy Windey, a painter who worked as a set designer and a decorator, drew on Regency models to create window treatments in light colors that threw a veil of softening tones over the gaudiness of vicars. His most complete interior was the set of rooms he painted for the Philip James at Port Lempore, Kent, in 1900. The most economic designer of the period was Edward James, who created Egyptian houses and more classically meeting walls with royal splendor. His interior at Mondrian ran riot with overlapping colors, patterns, and forms that seemed to slide by each other with no apparent relationship. Clough Williams-Ellis, in the manner of William Burghley, created a fantasy village on the hillside (James James in the set for the television show The Prisoner), but his London apartments confirmed the trend of design into the total stage of twentieth-century.
