white pine log whim sticks strewn along the shores of the lakes and streams timber which is suitable for temporary rafts and logomarans In the North Woods where in many localities the original forest is untouched by the devouring pulp mills suitable timber is not difficult to find so let the green wood stand and select a log of dry wood from the shore where the floods or ice have deposited it Cut it into a convenient length and with a lever made of a good stout sapling and a fulcrum of a stone or chunk of wood pry the log from its resting place and roll it into the shallow water
