McGregor Renewal And The Current Air Defense Mission:

McGregor Renewal and the Current Air Defense Mission David Rubenson, Rand arroyo center santa monica ca, 1998

The U S Department of Defense manages 25 million acres of federal land Most of it was assigned when there were few competing uses and few questions about DoD s need for land But population growth suburban sprawl environmental concerns and new categories of recreational use have changed the situation The DoD is increasingly being asked to justify its land holdings and determine what can be returned to the public domain The issue has immediate policy implications because 16 million DoD acres are classified as withdrawn public land This is typical for military land in the West and the term implies a congressional promise to return the land to the public domain when it is no longer needed for military purposes The urgency of the promise depends on the specific legislation that has withdrawn the land Some has been withdrawn in perpetuity while six major ranges comprising nearly 30 percent of DoD s land were withdrawn in 1986 for only 15 years under the Military Lands Withdrawal Act Unless Congress passes new legislation the lands will revert to the public domain in 2001 The purpose of this report is to evaluate the military need for one of the six ranges the Army s McGregor Range in southern New Mexico McGregor s 700 000 acres comprises more than half of Fort Bliss s 1 12 million acres Sections of McGregor are also used for cattle grazing and other nonmilitary purposes along with the military uses The Bureau of Land Management manages the cattle grazing program subject to Army access rules This report considers four policy questions 1 is the McGregor Range a critical Army wide priority 2 how intensely does the military use the McGregor Range 3 are military and nonmilitary uses balanced effectively and what could change that balance and 4 is it possible to transfer McGregor activities to the adjacent White Sands Missile Range which has more land and declining activity

McGregor Renewal and the Current Air Defense Mission David Rubenson, 1998 Six major military ranges comprising roughly 30 percent of the Department of Defense s lands will revert to the public domain in 2001 unless Congress reauthorizes their use for military purposes This report evaluates the military rationale for retaining in the military system the 600 000 acre McGregor Range on Fort Bliss The report is organized around arguments suggesting that the McGregor Range should be returned to the public domain 1 the range s low military utilization 2 doubts about the range s military role 3 speculation that McGregor activities could easily be transferred to the nearby White Sands Missile Range and 4 the range s important nonmilitary uses The authors find that low utilization numbers are an artifact of Army range record keeping Although it is moderately utilized McGregor is a critical factor in ensuring that Fort Bliss can perform its role as the nation s center for air defense The authors also find no obstacles to conducting the nonmilitary uses of McGregor in conjunction with existing military missions White Sands does have sufficient land and airspace to accommodate the McGregor mission but transferring activities could occur only in the context of a national evaluation of military basing options and policy The study concludes that there would be adverse military impacts in returning McGregor to the public domain but few positive changes in the level of nonmilitary use
