Life's Basis and Life's Ideal

The Fundamentals of a New Philosophy of Life

Philosophies of life, representations of human life as a whole, surround us to day in abundance and court our adherence. The fusion of rich historical development with active reflection gives occasion to the most diverse combinations and makes it easy for the individual to project a representation corresponding to his circumstances and his mood. Thus to day the philosophies of life of individuals whirl together in chaotic confusion, gain and lose the passing favour, displace one another and themselves change kaleidoscopically. It is not the concern of philosophy to occupy itself more closely with opinions so accidental and so fleeting. There are however philosophies of life of another kind, conceptions of life which unite and dominate large numbers of people, hold up a common ideal for their activity and constitute a power in the life of universal history. These philosophies of life are rooted in particular concrete forms of life, in actual combinations of working and striving which with dominating power surround the individual and point out his course. With such ascendancy they may seem to him to be unassailable and a matter of natural necessity; in reality they are a product of the industry of universal history and from this point of view appear merely as attempts to comprehend the boundless stream of life and to win a character for our otherwise indefinite existence. For at first we stand defenceless and helpless in face of the wealth of impressions and suggestions which throng upon us and draw us in opposite directions. Only in one way are we able to prevail: life must concentrate and acquire a controlling centre within itself and from that begin a process of counteraction We lack distinction of centre and environment we need an inner aspiration an aspiration which seeks to draw the whole of existence to itself and to mould it in its own particular way This however is impossible unless at the same time a philosophy of life a profession of faith as to the nature of the whole a justification of our undertaking is evolved A philosophy of life established in this manner will be incomparably more powerful and fuller in content than the mere foam on the surface of time
