and urban Nigeria between 2004 and 2010 They examines the contributions of growth and redistribution factors to changes in poverty within the two sectors The analysis was based on the National Living Standard Survey data of 2004 and 2009 2010 sourced from the National Bureau of Statistics and analysed using Shapley decomposition approach This collection also examines how the socioeconomic characteristics of households influence rural poverty The data for the study was extracted from the revised Nigerian General Household Survey data from 2010 2011 and a logistic regression technique was used to analyse said data The authors argue that the improvement of rural access in developing countries is essential for the success of sustainable development goals since poor access is one of the major causes of rural poverty and hampers rural development The concluding chapter describes the experiences from a research project on modern logistic chains in the Mount Kenya region demonstrating how small scale farmers organized how important infrastructures such as rural roads grading sheds and cooling devices were as well as intermediate means of transport in combination with modern cooling logistics and communication technologies

Rural Poverty and Degradation of Natural Resources in Ghana Alex Obeng Somuah, Edward Debrah Wiafe, 2016

The origin of rural poverty is complex and multidimensional. Some aspects of this origin include culture, climate, gender, markets, and public policy. Similarly, the rural poor population is quite diverse both in the problems they face and the possible solutions to those problems. This book examines the nature and characteristics of rural poverty and how it develops, its persistence, and how it has caused destruction to environmental resources. The quest for global stability and peace has placed poverty issues at the centre of deliberation. In the year 2000, the eight Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) directly addressed the problem of poverty and its alleviation. Natural resources degradation is usually understood in terms of over use of scarce non-renewable and potentially renewable resources. It entails damage or destruction of key natural resources such as soils and forests and the subsequent production of wastes. Low-income rural dwellers have much lower levels of consumption than middle and upper income groups but occupy much more land per person than middle and upper income groups. Yet low-income groups consume less food and generally have diets that are less energy and land intensive than higher income groups. However, low-income populations deplete natural resources for settlements, farming, and extraction of resources for many urban dwellers. This book has created the linkages between poverty in rural areas and environmental resources degradation. It draws conclusions from examples from all over the world and emphasises on a case study in rural Ghana. This book is recommended for academicians, rural development professionals, environmentalists, and the general public.

The State of World Rural Poverty Idriss Jazairy, Mohiuddin Alamgir, Theresa Panuccio, 1992. Despite almost four decades and billions of dollars in development activities, we are barely in a position to track the changing dynamics of poverty or to define with conviction the processes that entrap the poor in their misery. Accounting for about 90% of global poverty, rural poverty through transmigration is also a main contributor to urban poverty. It is in the rural areas of the world where poverty is most severe in human terms, where the hunger, hopelessness, hardship, and despair commonly associated with entrenched poverty are most pronounced, where basic health services, sanitation, educational opportunities, and other common amenities are most lacking. The alleviation of rural poverty is therefore tantamount to the alleviation of global poverty in its entirety. The State of World Rural Poverty offers the first comprehensive look at the economic conditions and prospects of the world's rural poor.

Rural Poverty in Developing Countries Mr. Mahmood Hasan Khan, 2001-03-14. Reviews causes of poverty in rural areas and presents a policy framework for reducing rural poverty including through land reform, public works programs, access to credit, physical and social infrastructure, subsidies, and transfer of technology. Identifies key elements for drafting a policy to reduce rural poverty.
