Excursions Michael Jackson, 2007-10-24 A village in Sierra Leone A refugee trail over the Pyrenees in French Catalonia A historic copper mine in Sweden The Shuf mountains in Lebanon The Swiss Alps The heart of the West African diaspora in southeast London The anthropologist Michael Jackson makes his sojourns to each of these far flung locations and to his native New Zealand occasions for exploring the contradictions and predicaments of social existence He calls his explorations excursions not only because each involved breaking with settled routines and certainties but because the image of an excursion suggests that thought is always on the way the thinker a journeyman whose views are perpetually tested by encounters with others Throughout Excursions Jackson emphasizes the need for preconceptions and conventional mindsets to be replaced by the kind of open minded critical engagement with the world that is the hallmark of cultural anthropology Focusing on the struggles and quandaries of everyday life Jackson touches on matters at the core of anthropology the state violence exile and belonging labor indigenous rights narrative power home and history He is particularly interested in the gaps that characterize human existence such as those between insularity and openness between the things over which we have some control and the things over which we have none and between ourselves and others as we talk past each other missing each others meanings Urging a recognition of the limits to which human existence can be explained in terms of cause and effect he suggests that knowing why things happen may ultimately be less important than trying to understand how people endure in the face of hardship
