

Early Production-Line Cars

By the end of the first decade of the 20th century it had become clear that the future of the automobile lay not only in mass production, but also in standardization of the product. As the demand for mass-produced automobiles grew, manufacturers began to develop cars that could be produced in large quantities. This led to the development of the early production-line cars, which were designed to be produced in large quantities and to be sold at a low price.
