

But such a build-up on the German side did not pass unnoticed by the Russians, and they began to concentrate their own, numerically superior, forces along the front. Thus the stage was set for the greatest armoured clash of the war. And this time the Russians would not be able to turn to Generals 'Mud' and 'Winter' for help.

The battle of Kursk opened early on the morning of 5 July 1943, and from the start the Luftwaffe units were deeply committed. As in the past, the ground attack and bomber units operated intensively in the battlefield area, in support of the armoured thrusts. The new Hs 129 tank-busting aircraft of the Fourth Gruppe of Schlachtgeschwader 9, under Hauptmann Bruno Meyer, proved to be particularly effective. On the fourth day of the offensive the unit caught a Russian attack in brigade strength, supported by some forty tanks, out in the open. The four Staffeln of the Gruppe, each with some sixteen Hs 129s, attacked in relays; as one was in action the other three were moving in to attack or else shuttling back to their base at Miloyanovka, twenty minutes flying time away, to re-arm. The German pilots aimed their 30 mm tungsten-cored cannon shells at the sides and rear of the tanks, where the armour was thinnest, and knocked out several of them. At the end of the battle, which lasted a little over an hour, the Russian attack had been brought to a halt.
