Schooling Diaspora Karen M. Teoh, 2017-12-01 Education has long been a cornerstone of Chinese culture Traditional Chinese norms have also held that the less education and exposure to influence from outside the home a girl had the more likely she would be to remain true to conventional domestic values and to remain morally upright In the mid nineteenth century overseas Chinese communities encountered a new perspective via Western European and American missionary schools Formal education could be not just helpful but integral to preserving female virtue and had the added benefit of elevating the socio cultural status of the overseas Chinese As a result increasing numbers of girls began to attend school Within a few decades other groups who sponsored female education local Chinese community leaders mainland Chinese reformists the British colonial government were offering a competing approach education for the sake of modernization These diverse and sometimes divergent priorities preoccupied educators parents politicians and of course the girls and women who attended these institutions In this work Karen Teoh relates the history of English and Chinese girls schools that overseas Chinese founded and attended from the 1850s to the 1960s in British Malaya and Singapore She examines the strategies of missionaries colonial authorities and Chinese reformists and revolutionaries for educating girls as well as the impact that this education had on identity formation among overseas Chinese women and larger society Such schools ranged from charitable missions operated by nuns who rescued orphans and prostitutes to elite institutions for the daughters of the wealthy and powerful They could tailor their curricula to suit the specific needs of female students emphasizing domestic skills such as sewing and cooking or later training for women's work in teaching nursing or secretarial jobs They would help to produce what society needed in the form of better wives and mothers or workers and citizens of developing nation states while ensuring compliance with desired ideals Chinese women in diaspora found that failing to conform to any number of state priorities could lead to social disapproval marginalization or even outright deportation Overseas Chinese communities were mindful of these perils and their responses were as myriad as their modes of identity construction and adaptation They grappled with questions of how this project might support Chinese nationalism absorb the best of British colonial influence
